

I have become more dependant on XM radio as a highly dependable tool in my business travel. It has solved one of my biggest problems when it comes to finding timely traffic and weather information. Not only is it timely and dependable, it safer. I can find information I need without the fumbling and searching the dial. I may find a local station but the chances of them having or discussing what I need to hear at that moment is highly unlikely. If the NAB wants to get to the root of the problem, they should start with their own. I'm really surprised that some stations have any listening audience. Make them compete and improve their services. The days of mom & pop radio stations are numbered.

Bob Dylan says it all; "The Times they are a'Changing".
